It is based on a phase shift induced by a phase modulator (often called “phase shifter”). The phase modulator is for example a Michelson interferometer, an electro-optic modulator (EOM) or a liquid crystal display (LCD). A phase shift induced by a phase modulator, typically a phase modulator in an interferometer, comprises a temporal modulation of the optical path difference between two arm of the interferometer. This modulation is obtained by displacing the phase modulator

Generalized use of large-scale chemical libraries to study GPCR activation. G protein-coupled receptors (GPCRs) are the largest family of drug targets. A key determinant of drug selectivity for GPCRs is the binding sites of the transmembrane helices (TM). The development of high-throughput screening (HTS) technologies for GPCRs has been lagging behind that of other therapeutic targets due to the large size of the family of these receptors. Here we describe the screening of an amorphous library of compounds against the D3 dopamine receptor, an orphan GPCR. Although we successfully identified a new agonist and an antagonist, the first GPCR HTS compounds were amorphous and aggregated. We overcame this problem by replacing the amorphous compounds with crystalline ones, which were more robust and suitable for HTS. Then, we screened a chemical library for general agonists at the D3 receptor, which we validated by a conventional concentration-response curve using a specific D3 agonist. Using this method, we discovered novel agonists of the D3 receptor and identified a novel scaffold for a selective D3 agonist. The GPCR HTS approach described here can be used to identify agonists and antagonists for GPCRs and provides a useful strategy for screening against orphan GPCRs.
